THE HAUNTED HIDE-OUT

Yakky Doodle had journeyed far from home to visit an old friend. Now, as he returned to his pond, heavy clouds darkened the skies with an early nightfall.

"I won't get home before dark," the little duck thought, "and I'm tired from traveling so far. I think I'd better find a place to spend the night."

Yakky found a small pond surrounded by thick woods. It looked like the perfect place, and he settled down on it happily and closed his eyes. But sleep would not come—the pond had an eerie air about it, which filled Yakky with restlessness. The little duck paddled along the shore, looking for a more pleasant spot. Then he saw the sign, standing beside the water.

"Spirit Pond," Yakky gasped, reading the big bold letters. "Oooh! No wonder it's so spooky! It's haunted!"

Yakky turned to run. Then, taking a deep breath, he caught on to his courage.

"No," he thought. "I'm a brave little duck, and I know there's no such thing as spirits and ghosts."

At that instant, with a sudden gust of wind, a white figure leaped out of the bushes toward Yakky!

"Qua-a-a-ck! There is a ghost!" the frightened duck cried. With another puff of the wind, the ghost landed at Yakky's feet! The little duck stood still with fear, waiting for the ghost's next move. Then, with a sigh of relief, he chuckled, "It's nothing but an old white tablecloth! I only imagined it was a ghost!"

Just then, a shrill wail came from the distance. Yakky's heart beat rapidly, as he listened. "It's police sirens," he decided at last, settling down once more.

A moment later, Yakky's eyes flew open at the sound of crackling brush and running feet. Quickly, Yakky hid in the reeds, near the tablecloth, as two sinister figures approached the pond.

"(Puff, puff!) Let's rest here a minute, Jake," panted one man.

"But the police are on our trail, Sam!" his companion protested.

"They can't find us here in the dark, and we'll be gone by morning," Sam replied.

"All right, but let's not stay here long. Brr... this place gives me creeps," Jake muttered, shuddering.

"Oh-oh," thought Yakky. "These men are crooks! I can't let them get away. I'll have to catch them somehow."

Laughing to himself, Yakky let out a long low moan. "Ooooooooooh!" he cried, his voice echoing eerily around the water.

"What's that?" asked Sam, trembling with fear and looking around.

"I—I don't know," Jake quavered.

Both men sat quietly, their eyes searching the gloomy darkness.

"Oooh," wailed Yakky again. "Who dares to awaken the Spirit of the Pond?"

With this, Yakky covered himself with the white tablecloth and flew from his hiding place directly toward the crooks.

"It's a ghost! A ghost!" the men cried, scrambling off into the woods.

In their frantic haste, the two men ran directly into the searching policemen.

As Yakky watched, flying high above them, he chuckled, "I really didn't catch those crooks. They were caught by their own imagination. So they imagined this was a haunted hide-out, so they didn't have a ghost of a chance!"
